This is worthy of Sir Boyle hard thing to overcome; and the principles of civil liberty embodied in the Free State Constitutions express the settled convictions of the people, so that there is no hope whatever that they will be rooted out by sermons, books of travel, or religio-politico novels of the sablecloud stamp. And none but a lunatic would suppose that a war like this, with its loss of life and treasure, would help bring about say such modification of opinion as Dr. Adams deems necessary. His theory of the result of the war is that we shall let the South alone hereafter. and leave to Providence the question as to the destiny of the slaves. The North, he says, must adopt such views as the candid Christian people of the South generally entertain, or consent that they shall, unmolested, perpetuate or change their social state; and if the latter, in their own time and way. Considering the fact that the slaveholders have made war upon us, not because we have meddled with their institution, but because we have taken precautions that it shall not meddle with and destroy us, this is refreshingly cool, and shows that the preacher who is undertaking to find a solution of our troubles is not only prepared for any degradation to which the slaveholders may ask us to submit, but eager to consent to it. He thinks that the North is wrong and the South right, and he hopes that the result of the contest will be, not the undisputed supremacy of the free ideas and institutions of the North, but the tolerance of the patriarchal institution throughout the country. In fact, Slavery is Dr. Adams's ebony idol. He graciously concedes that the Lord may, if He sees fit, do away with it; wisdom will be very greatly diminished if He does.
